The Voice That Called

The men in the clubroom had been telling stories, and, the available stock of narratives having given out, we were casting

"Yes," said my friend, the director of and partner in a noted ocean steamship line, "I have had quite a few remarkable incidents happen to me in my day, especially he thought of the extensive number of ves sels he now controlled.

"But I think the most trying experience I ever knew took place even before then, when I was a youngster of twenty and while it was a jointgater in twenty mix very proud of being trusted with a ship while still so young."

"Hold on till I get my cigar lit." said somebody, and there was a little delay at-tendant upon the fulling of glasses and the assuming of more comfortable positions, before Wilson nodded to the captain, and e began again.

"You see," he said, "I was a clergyman's son, and my family looked upon my desire to follow the sea as utter foolshoess, but after I had run away a dozen sances, but after I had run away a dozen times or so and been followed and brought back just as many, my father thought he might as well let me have my own way, so he took me down to Liverpool and apprenticed me properly and in due form to an old friend of his, who was the head of a great merchantman line running to the West Indies and back. I was only 14 then and I believe the idea was that I should and be glad to beg for home again; when this happened, I was, of course, to be let go, for friendship's sake, and would be started off to college in due order; a year or so behind my proper time, but still not irredeemably late."

The old captain smiled again, and a twinkle brightened his eye, as though he was very much amused internally, but his voice was as dry as ever and not the shadow of a smile transgressed the from laughing at his own stories. Some of the listeners stirred a little lazily as he paused, and Wilson, who was always the leader, nodded to him to continue.

"Well," he complied, "I disappointed my father and enjoyed sea life so much that my captain gave fine accounts of me, and my father's friends took a great liking to me and often had me to spend a week at his home when the ship was in port and I, fearing to be late in foining her again, had shortened my home visit and was waiting for the day of starting. His wife was kind to me, too; and he had a little daughter, who-but that's antici-

"The years of my apprenticeship passed and the proud moment when I received my papers as a 'master mariner' arrived. Then I was given a ship, although my youth made this a very unusual thing, and sent off to the West Indies. Of course, I was supplied with an old and experienced first mate, and it was probably due as much to his care and watchfulmness as to my own skill, that the voyage passed off without an accident or mischance of any kind, but I was as proud as a hen with her first batch of chickers, and the head of the firm showed his confidence in my abilities in a manner which came very near to losing him a

"'Arther, my boy,' he said to me some days before I sailed again, 'I'm going out with you. I'm going to take my wife and daughter along, too; we all fancy the trip and it struck me that we would go with wife has made the trip on a merchantman many a time when we were younger and my daughter is very anxious to try it. You can let the ladies have the "wife's cubin,"

"In those days every merchant ship was supplied with a little cabin for the use of the captain's wife, although they stopped the to carry their families with them. Of course I was very willing to have my friends as passengers, although I was a little nervous at the thought of my employer being in the ship with me and having his sharp old eyes taking notice of my

must stay at home.
" 'But there is no need for the old lady and my little girl to do so,' he told me when I went to say good-by; 'they can go along with you and I shall insist upon this. Another trip will make the season too late and I think the voyage will benefit them. I put them in your care and trust you with them." "So the two ladies went out with me, the only women on board the ship, and we had hardly got out of the Channel before the

"It's opeer for such an old sailor as I." she murmured faintly as I assisted her down below, 'but I suppose I'm out of practice.' "She got enough practice in the miseries of seasickness that trip to last her some time, poor thing, and in the meantime the daughter, who, while her mother siept, invariably came up on deck, renewed her old friendship with me. I had not seen much of her for some years, since she had been at school during my brief visits at her home, and we found the recalling of old times delightful.

"Every night, even after her mother had recovered partially, we promenaded the deck together, and our friendship grew space. One night, when the older lady was selow, suffering with a headache, we talked until very late, and she told me queer tales of ghosts and sleep-walkers and the like She had been filled with these stories while at school, and we enjoyed them as only very young people do enjoy listening to and tell-ing of horrors. Among other things she told me of an experience she had once had her self in the sleep-walking line, in which she had climbed down a ladder placed at a sec-ond-story window and reached the ground in safety, but still fast asleep. "While we talked we alternately paced the and leap off into that silvery water.

"She spoke lightly, but I shivered from an unexplained presentiment of evil, and she catching the influence of my mood, shuddered suddenly and hastily turned the subject. We talk for a while longer, but the pleasure of our conversation had somehow been spoiled by that careless remark, and she soon bade me good-night and went

The wind was rising and I could hear it waiting softly, with the eerie sound which it aiways has at night and at sen, but I could hear nothing else, and I was about dozing when that call come again.

was about dozing when that call came again.

"This time it sounded as though it were farther off, but its appeal for help was just as clear to my brain, and I hesitated no longer. Hastily slipping into my clothing I dished up the companion, and as I touched the deck I heard it plainly once more. 'Come!' it pleaded in a lingering cry, and as I stood straining my eyes to pierce the stormy darkness which had succeeded the brilliant moonlight it seemed to die away in the direction of the main-boom. At the same time I saw, or faucied I saw, a glimmer of semething white creening slow ly along the boom, and upon coming nearer I saw that it was a woman's figure, slender and graceful, and clothed in some-thing long and white and flowing. The form was quite erect, and it seemed to gilde along the dangerous way without a faiter or even so much as a feeling for footing in the darkness; the arms were spread widely in a similar attitude to that which a rope walker assumes when cross-ing a slack rope, and the head was thrown back, as though the gaze was directed to the threatening sky.

20 YEARS TO DO AN ERRAND.

on, Supposed to Be Dead, Crosses the Old Homestend Threshold. A Wilmot, S. D., dispatchsays that Charles H. Wright, son of Lambert Wright, who was sent on an errand by his stepmother twenty years ago, and who had not been eard of from that day, returned to-day to his father's home, bringing with him the article he had been sent to get, together with a wife and four children. When the boy went away the Wright family was living at Fox Lake, Wis. Charles Was ordered by his stepmother to go to the store and get a ciothes-time. The boy was displeased, and instead of doing the errand left the town. A few years later Mr. and Mrs. Wright removed to this place, where they own a large farm. They have looked upon Charles as dead. In the meantime, the boy had gone to Monticello, Minn., where he, in the course of time, married and raised a family. A few days ago be learned that his father was living here and came on a visit. Before going to the house on arriving here he went to the store and purchased a clothen line, and armed with this, and followed by dropped the line at their feet.

A New System. The Tacoma customs-house will in future weigh all gold coin presented in payment of duties, instead of counting it, as heretofora. Considerable quantities of gold coin from this and other customs-houses in the die trict have lately been rejected by the United States depository as being under weight, and it is to guard against loss from this cause that the new system has been s In English financial institutions the custom of weighing all gold coin is universal. The coin is never touched by the hand, but is shoveled off the counter into the scales with a metal scoop and emptied from the scales into bags. Much time is saved in the avoidance of counting, and the scale not only infallibly indicates the number of coins, but also the presence of any counterfeit or light-weight pieces.-Exchange.
